Snake in toilet florida

Dos, a two-headed snake (Photo: © Jonathan Mays/FWC Fish and Wildlife Research Institute) What has two brains, no legs and the best pic profile on Facebook? That would be the rare, two-headed racer snake recently discovered by a house cat in Palm Harbor, Florida.The cat's 'm's family was rudely introduced to the supernatural snake about a month ago when their cat, Olive, let go of the critter on their living room floor, according to a Facebook post. The family was stunned to see that a small, speckled snake with two heads attached to the same body, each of them was able to move their eyes, neck and tongue independently. The family called the snake Dos - Spanish for two. His biggest problem is food, said Kay Rogers, a cat owner with a two-headed dog on Facebook. We try a lot of things, but he has problems coordinating his two heads. Dos two-headed snake (Image credit: Jonathan Mays/FWC Fish and Wildlife Research Institute) This condition - known as bicephaly - is an uncommon abnormality that occurs during embryonic development when identical twins do not fully separate, Live Science previously reported. The condition appears in all kinds of animals, including deer and porpoises; people seem to encounter live bipolar snakes about once a year. In 2019, a bicephalous rattlesnake named Double-Dave appeared in New Jersey, while a two-headed viper entered the family estate in Virginia in 2018. Dos has just helped 2020 reach an amount. Bicephalic animals tend to rough it up in the wild, where their competing brains make it difficult to do things like catch prey or escape predators. As such, it often ends up in the custody of wildlife experts. For now, Dos is under the care of the Florida Fish and Wildlife Conservation Commission (FWC), which recently took some cool shots to the head (head shots?) of the snake on Facebook. FWC experts have identified Dos as a juvenile southern black mamba (Coluber constrictor Priapus), a small, non-venomous snake common in the southeastern United States.Dos certainly has a better survival boost under the care of FWC herpetologists than in the wild (for starters, you don't have to worry about curious cats anymore), but life will be far from easy. In nature, two heads are not always better than one. Just ask this worm, which grew a second face on his ass. Snakes move their tongue fork to bring scents to their sensory glands. Photo: istockphoto.comThe most is: Dealing with a clogged toilet is more or less as fun, but, unfortunately, just as necessary as the root canal. So if you have tried the plunger, hot flushing water and even a homemade solution of baking soda and they still don't flow as they should, it's probably time to call a snake (also known as a plumber snail). However, this does not necessarily mean naming a professional. Professional. You can hire a hose specially made for the task at hand from your local hardware store for about $10 to $15 a day (much more affordable than even the most reasonable $50 per hour plumber fee). The drain hose is a very effective tool that has a long metal cable with a curled hook on the tip, ideal for dredging unwanted material from the chamber. Just follow the instructions here to learn how to hose the toilet and just rinse the problem. Tools & MaterialsStep 1Call your favorite hardware store to find out if it rents augers suitable for toilets. Check one per day and get acquainted with its mechanics before use. The drain hose, housed in a thin rubber hose, has an angular handle that also acts as a crank at one end; the other end goes to the toilet bowl. (An electric snail will attach to a drill, but manual snails are usually effective for this job and cost much less to rent.) Step 2Mic rubber gloves and place a large, empty bucket or waterproof container next to the toilet. Place the end of the screw cable into the toilet bowl and point it towards the drain at the back. Crank the handle clockwise to release and extend the cable down to the trigger; rotate the crank until it stops, clogging has been reached. Step 3Pull slightly back on the hose. If you feel resistance, it probably means that you have connected the source, so turn the crank in the opposite direction to restore the unwanted material to the surface. Remove from the bowl and discard to a bucket. Repeat if necessary to make sure that the clogging has been completely released. Then turn the snail, cranking the handle counterclockwise and place the wet end in the bucket. Crank the cable as far as it will be, jiggle it slightly, pull it back and repeat several times. When you are able to move it further and more freely than you were when you started, you violated the clogging. Now remove the snail and glue the end of the company in a bucket. Step 5 To avoid overflow during rinsing, remove the tank cover and manually stop the flap from releasing too much water into the bowl. This is a two-handed procedure: with a less dominant hand, rinse the toilet as usual and close the flap - a 2- or 3-inch rubber disc attached to the chain inside the tank - with the dominant hand to prevent the bowl from filling too high. Once you are sure that the clogging has disappeared, rinse again, leaving the flap alone. Step 6Could clean up, dump any waste collected in the bucket back to the toilet in small quantities and rinse to make sure everything goes down without causing a new clogging. Then thoroughly clean the and snail with very hot water and bleach or vinegar before returning it to the store. Avoiding the future You may be able to save yourself the hassle of repeated performance, taking care of what you put in the chest of drawers. The safest approach is only to rinse toilet paper. Sanitary products, paper towels, floss and hair should never be rinsed. If you have particularly old or sensitive pipes, consider switching to a lighter brand of toilet paper to help keep things moving. It turns out that the problem is the hose rolled around the bowing of the machine. Description: Viral images circulating since: November 2002 Status: Photos appear authentic Email collected November 12, 2002 Subject: Computer Tech SupportTech Support: Hello, Computer support. How can we help you? Customer: Hi. My computer was making a strange hissing noise last night and this morning when I turned it on there were crackling noise and then a little smoke and then nothing. If I bring it you can fix it? Technical support: Sure, bring it on and we'll take a look at it. Look at the pictures. Viral image, source unknown Email collected May 1, 2003 FW: You'll never believe this one, but it's trueThis is the real story. This woman went to a local computer store to buy a computer that her family wanted to get so she could email them. The seller told her that they would supply the computer, set it up and give her some tips on how to use it, if she had any problems later all she had to do was call their technical support, they would talk to her on the phone or go home to find the problem. The seller asked her if she wanted to buy a 2-year home warranty, the woman said yes. Viral image, source unknown A few months have passed, she was getting good sending and receiving mail and checking other websites with only one phone for technical support until one day. She called technical support. SUPPORT: Hello, technical support, how can I help!ady: Last night my computer started making a lot of hissing noise on me so I quit, this morning when I turned it on the computer started hissing and cracking, and then started smoking and an unpleasant smell, it's. Viral image, source unknown SUPPORT: I'll have a technician come on first thing this morning, just leave your computer as it is so they can find the problem and fix it or change it with another computer. Give me your address and phone number, and the technician will be there as soon as possible in the morning. When the technician got there, the lady showed the technician where the computer was, she said what happened to him, that's what the technician thought was wrong. See the pictures... you won't believe your eyes!! shikheighoh/Getty Independent? It's hard to say having so little evidence to move on. Although the previous images were not (as far as I can tell), the same does not necessarily apply to the snake itself. Does it really crawl into the computer on its own, or was it placed there as a joke? Your guess is as good as mine. Computer processors generate heat and reptiles like warm places to hide, so this is not implausible given the possibility and large enough hole to squeeze through that wayward snake would take refuge in the computer case. In fact, only such an event was reported in 2002 in Gatineau, Quebec, according to an article in the Ottawa Citizen: Gatineau man searching for a baseball glove in his basement office made a failing discovery instead. Gilles St-Jean noticed that there was a warning on the computer screen that the disc had been ejected. He tried to press a button to close the door holding the drive. It went halfway and then jumped out again. That's when he saw the snake's head protruding from the disk handle. He grabbed the reptile, but disappeared into the guts of the computer. It should be noted that the details of the above report are much less dramatic than those of the email stories at hand. Absent are an inexperienced female computer user as the main character (how wise she was to opt for a two-year warranty!), a mysterious hiss and a crackle, followed by a puff of smoke heralding a damaged computer, and a visit (or through, depending on the version) of an unsuspecting Tech Support guy, much of which is to uncover the gruesome causes of the crash. It's the comparative richness of narrative detail, the fact that there's more than one variant of the story, and insisting that it's absolutely true are features of an urban legend, suggesting that the transmitted text may not provide a true description of what's going on in the pictures. As folklorist Jan Harold Brunvand notes, snakes have been visible in human folklore and mythology since time immemorial, most often as a symbol of evil or misfortune. Paradoxically, much of the contemporary folklore surrounding snakes is due to the fact that many people keep these otherwise denigrated creatures as pets. When these animals loosen up and find themselves in unexpected places, the publicity about the incidents is significant, writes Brunvand, and tends to feed in legendary knowledge of hoses in toilets, curled up around water pipes, in heating holes, under floorboards, inside empty walls and so on. It's time to add computers to this list, though keep in mind that not everything that looks like a snake is a snake. Last updated 10/31/15 10/31/15
